

It seems that the government is unconcerned about creating new pollution that is completely unnecessary. The communications options open to individuals and businesses now are completely adequate, and continuing to expand in their own avenues. Creating a new avenue is unnecessary and will likely cause more harm than good. Shouldn't the FCC and related agencies require the big energy companies to get the problems they already have fixed and in order before allowing this new "problem" to arise? This is exactly why the public has no faith in our government. You don't really care about me, or my job, you care about how much money you can make. No wonder our national debt is ridiculously huge.
